Ron Moore sure didn’t play like he was the underdog in this year’s Colorado state Match-Play championship at Fort Collins Country Club.

Then again, maybe he did.

Moore certainly played like he had nothing to lose when he came away with a 1-up victory over Lakewood’s Don Keffner after 21 holes Sunday.

Yet, throughout the week the Denver golfer kept insisting he was the overwhelming underdog in this year’s tournament. In fact, he and his wife checked in and out of their hotel room each day.

“I kept thinking I was going to lose every day and I didn’t want to stick around if I lost,” said Moore, laughing after his victory over Keffner.

That laughter was a long time coming though, as Moore and Keffner had to battle through three sudden-death holes before a winner was determined.

Moore advanced after a 1-up victory in the morning over former University of Colorado golfer Terry Kahl while Keffner had an easy 7-6 win over Colorado Springs’ Dow Finsterwald Jr. to move into the final.

It appeared Keffner might have the advantage in the early rounds of the championship match. After five holes he had a commanding 2-up lead capitalizing on three missed Moore putts.

“My short game had been great up until this afternoon,” Moore said after the match.

But Moore’s nervousness seemed to fade on the sixth hole, as he made a long putt for a birdie, to put him just one down. On the very next hole Moore posted another birdie to move into a tie with Keffner, after Keffner’s drive was off to the right side of the green.

Keffner missed a putt of his own on the next hole and fell to one under after the front nine. Moore increased his lead to 2-up after another birdie on the 10th hole.

Keffner fought back though, taking advantage of another missed putt by Moore on the 11th hole.

Moore and Keffner hit well off the tee most of the day, but both ran into trouble on the 12th hole as they hit into the trees on the side of the fairway.

However, Keffner made the best of it, when his second shot from behind the trees nearly dropped in the hole after hitting the pin.

Keffner was able to even the score once again, sinking a 10-inch putt for a birdie on the hole.

The two golfers remained even for the next eight holes. And although Moore hit a long put for a birdie on the 18th, Keffner stayed right with him with a birdie of his own to push the contest into sudden-death.

“When I made that put on 18 I thought it was over,” Moore said.

Maintaining the pace set throughout most of the afternoon, Moore and Keffner continued to play even golf for the first two holes of the sudden-death playoff.

An increased wind gave both golfers trouble with their tee shots on the par-three 20th hole. Both missed the green with their drives, but were able to get on with their second shots.

It looked as though they might stay even for yet another hole on the 21st when both golfers hit their second shot near the trap. But once again it was a missed putt — this time by Keffner — that spelled the difference. Moore made par on the hole, while Keffner had to settle for a bogey.

“That final putt should have broken to the left, but it went right because of the wind,” a disappointed Keffner said after the match. “I hit the putt just the way I wanted to, it just went the wrong way. I just didn’t play well all day.”

Moore’s sentiments weren’t the same at all.

“I didn’t want the finals to end that way, but I thought it would eventually come down to one of us missing a shot like that,” he said. “I had such a difficult match this morning, and I played so well that by the time I got to the finals I was elated.”

“It was such a high that I really didn’t know what I was doing.”
